In this game I try to create the atmosphere of the Soviet times. The main part of the atmosphere and the game is based on the 1980's. The main parts of the game are the following: -1) The main mission of the game is solving the puzzle of the hand that reacts to your actions, either using its motion or changing its appearance. It is done using artistic achievement. -2) I try to describe the atmosphere of the times, its blue-collar culture, the religion, the Soviet-style of life. -3) In the game, there is a man that doesn't seem to be alive, but if you listen to his thoughts it is somehow alive. -4) Using the generated sounds and a modern soundtrack we can convey the message that this is the new reality and not the real reality. -5) Using the created and developed character models and the traditional charm of the soviet times, we can tell the history of the time we are living in. -6) The characters have their own individual style of acting. The characters behave as they should. Each character has a personality. He is friendly or hostile to the player. Each character is ready for their own type of play. One of the characters (Nadezhda) treats the player like a friend, others (Irina, Artem) treat him like a stranger. Some of them are rude or primitive. -7) Each character has their own visual appearance, but not the graphic ones. The Story The Cold War. The world was divided into two parts. Those who watched, and those who fought. To the East of the Iron Curtain there was the Communist Russia, where the USSR was first born in 1922. That land closed the borders with the rest of the world for their own good. In the mid-80's this was suddenly suddenly open for a small group of intrepid explorers. They were leaders of the KGB, and they had been sent to the eastern lands to make a breakthrough and establish some new inroads into the Soviet society. Well, the BOT (Border Trooper) unit 1. When the game begins the player can choose one of four characters to play as: *-1) Mac (Mikhail Danilovich): He is a humble person with only one thing on his mind - to prove himself in the eyes of his superiors. He is a KGB officer who has a deep s Bring Late-Summer Bolt-Event March 1st, 20015:13 am Meteor Storms Bring Late-Summer Bolt-Event to Metro Detroit By Aaron Pressman Geologists may be able to trace the abnormal weather patterns back in time to the late summer of 2012. By Travis R. deJager Satellite photos show that a series of distinct and forceful intrusions of deep, hot, and dry air have moved through Michigan during the 2012 summer, with some of the strongest and most unusual occurring on the far southeast side of the state. This quirk of the weather is identified from a series of clearings in the summer field of surface evaporation, or “Bolt Week.” The most recent high-resolution aerial photos from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration—which record the state of surface vapor flow as it reflects heat—show only two distinct, sizable Bolt Weeks in southeast Michigan between July 15 and July 30, 2012. Advertisement According to Michigan State University geoscientist David Rotenberry, who works on the NASA/NOAA/NSF-supported Eastern Near-Surface Water and Ice Observing Mission that provides data for the forecast, the 2012 “Bolt Weeks” did not originate from the area of Bolt that is marked in the near-surface vapor images but rather were produced in the western section by very large mega-pressure systems. “They have a number of names,” says Rotenberry. “Some people have applied the term ‘Megabot’ for these systems, though I find it a bit misleading because they are so extreme. They were associated with the remnants of the second front that swept through the Midwest during late May and early June.” The massive systems developed at the interface of the mid-latitude westerly jetstream and a far more northerly low-pressure air cell called the Western Disturbance. Rotenberry says the different names applied to the systems, some of which persisted for seven days, came from people who were looking for synonyms for the word “wind.” The intense high-speed winds have left their mark on the land in the form of hardened surface sediments that are believed to have been deposited by jets of air. The remnants of these winds are evident in the unusual dry weather that came to Michigan following the late May passage of the second front

The invention relates generally to dentistry and, more particularly, to an improved tooth cap which can be placed on the proximal end of a dental implant following the placement thereof. In dentistry, various techniques and devices have been developed and used to allow a dentist to stabilize and form an endosteal oral implant in a jawbone. Among the various techniques and devices developed, two commonly-used methods for establishing a sufficiently strong attachment to bone tissue of an oral implant placed into a jawbone to function as a tooth root or a replacement of a natural tooth root or bone implant involve the use of either screws or a locking cap, which are adapted to fit into the bone, and a dental fixation screw, which is adapted to threadingly receive the screw and engage the cap when positioned adjacent thereto and is designed to provide a bearing point for the implant fixture. A major problem associated with both of the above described methods is that the cap is extremely difficult for the dentist to screw into the implant and is even more difficult to obtain a tight fit between the cap and the implant. Because of the difficulty in properly seating the cap, it is common for the cap to tilt out of the correct position when installed, thus resulting in a loose fit and an improper, and possibly an inferior, attachment of the cap to the implant. If the cap tilts to one side or the other and becomes loose, then a resilient tissue-to-implant bond is impaired or lost and the cap begins to slide about, thereby
