Beard threading /w/ a blunt shave In recent days I've found myself really enjoying the art of 'Beard threading' or 'Shaving a beard'. I feel like I've really gotten to a place where I'm getting comfortable with my brush and shaving soap. It's been a couple years since I've shaved, it's been a long time since I've even touched one. I'm realizing now that I just need to keep practicing and get use to the right way of using the razor to get a smooth shave, without getting over looking for the skin-scrape. I'd rather find that skin-scrape than getting a smooth shave and having my face get irritated, but that's the thing, it's harder to shave without skin-scrape. So my question is this: I've never before been a lover of a beard. I have a short, light beard, but it's not really all that manly, really thin on the top, heavy on the bottom, and since I trim it regularly, it's not even that long. And so far, I'm loving the process. Is this way of shaving a beard the best route? I've got a pretty nice walnut handle Gillette Mach3. A good set of close and safety razors is an invaluable investment in your shaving and general well-being I had the same thing, i feel the same way. The only problem is that i couldn't get it smooth enough, without a skin-scrape. I gave up shaving for a while, it was an absolute mauling. Now, i just shave with an electric razor and it goes very very smooth with the right technique. It's a much simpler way of shaving. You don't have to carve your beard up with a blade for god's sake!
